Frown, and Smile

Her hair of coal waves with the wind,
as she stands at the terrace, lips with a hymn.

Trees dance along to the gentle rhythm,
As her eyes droop low and scour her vision.

To gentle music dying down,
Her lips are shown up as a frown.
The trees still fumble in her wake,
Yet scarlet flora falls to the rake.

The sun behind the darkened cloud,
As raindrops fall with a drumming sound.

Behind the walls of tinted glass,
A gaze of hope shines through and pass.

How bright and warm, she stands and smiles,
As a lone bud blossoms as water tiled.
When the sky is covered by with a shadow,
Nature fights back here against this battle.

Librarian's Corner

Concrete Roses by Angie Thomas

For fans of The Hate U Give, Angie Thomas' new book, Concrete Rose, is just as authentic and gripping.

Seventeen-year-old Maverick is trying to keep it together with school, two jobs, dope slinging, and a girlfriend while his gang legend dad is in jail. Unexpectedly, he has a baby. So when he's offered the chance to go straight, he takes it. He wants to prove that he's different in a world that expects him to amount to nothing. However, when you're a part of the King Lords, it's not that easy to walk away. Maverick will have to deal with what it means to be loyal and responsible especially after the brutal murder of a loved one.

~ Ms. Jeung, Balboa Librarian
